Cutting your energy costs and carbon foot print in 2008

Bend residents are reducing their utility bills and creating healthier homes with help from a local business

BEND, OREGON – With environmental conservation on the mind of many Central Oregon residents and high utility bills eating away at their paychecks, residents are searching for a way to reduce their energy consumption. In instances where solar power may not be practical or financially viable for many homeowners, there are many other energy efficiency upgrades that can be done to the home.

According to Green Savers Co-Founder, Kevin Bryant, “It is really starting to become apparent to Central Oregonians that they can reduce their energy consumption without sacrificing their life style.”

With the on going debate over global warming and concerns over our national dependency on fossil fuels, being reported on daily by the media, people are searching for ways to do their part. There are many affordable upgrades that can be made to people’s homes to increase energy efficiency. Many of these efficiency upgrades make for a more comfortable and healthy home, while reducing your homes carbon footprint.

One local family was pleasantly surprised by the reduction in the draftiness of their house after Green Savers sealed the houses exterior envelop. They reported that after the upgrades were installed, the furnace turned on far less frequently.

“Oregon residents are in a unique position with the incentives available through the Oregon Energy Trust and tax credits from state and local government’s homeowners can be reimbursed for a major portion of their energy efficiency upgrades.” says Robert Hamerly, Co-Founder of Green Savers.

Green Savers is on the cutting edge of the home performance industry, Green Savers consults with homeowners on the best approach to convert their home to a healthy, comfortable and highly efficient home. Not only are Green Savers home performance consultants, they are licensed contractors and install all the necessary upgrades. Green Savers works with each homeowner to ensure they are getting the maximum benefits from the incentives and tax credits offered.
